Early History and Settlement

The area that is now Kansas City has a long history of indigenous habitation. Native American tribes, including the Osage and Kansa, thrived in the region for centuries prior to European exploration. The first European to explore the area was French explorer Étienne Veniard de Bourgmont in the early 18th century, who recognized the strategic importance of the rivers.

In the 1830s, the United States government began to encourage westward expansion, leading to increased settlement in the region. The establishment of Fort Leavenworth in 1827, just across the river in Kansas, served as a military outpost and further stimulated growth in the vicinity.

The Founding of Kansas City

Kansas City was officially founded in 1838, when it was laid out as a town by Francis J. Parker and his partners. Originally named "Town of Kansas," it was established as a trading hub due to its advantageous location at the confluence of the two rivers. The name was later changed to "Kansas City" in 1889 to avoid confusion with the state of Kansas.

The early economy of Kansas City was primarily driven by agriculture and trade. By the mid-19th century, the city had become an essential stop for traders and settlers heading west, contributing to its rapid growth.
