About Katie Davis and Her Mission

Katie Davis is an American author and missionary known for her remarkable work in Uganda. Inspired by a strong sense of faith and a desire to serve, she moved to Jinja, Uganda, where she founded Amazima Ministries. Her mission focuses on caring for orphaned and vulnerable children, providing education, healthcare, and spiritual guidance. Katie's work stands out due to her personal involvement in the lives of the children she serves, often adopting many herself and creating a family environment. Her dedication highlights the power of grassroots humanitarian efforts driven by compassion and commitment.

Early Life and Calling

Katie Davis grew up in Brentwood, Tennessee, and was raised in a Christian household that emphasized service and mission work. At the age of 18, she traveled to Uganda for a short mission trip, an experience that profoundly altered her life trajectory. Witnessing the extreme poverty and suffering faced by many children in Uganda, Katie felt compelled to make a lasting difference. This calling led her to return permanently to Uganda, where she immersed herself in the community and began her impactful work.

Establishment of Amazima Ministries

In Uganda, Katie founded Amazima Ministries, an organization dedicated to providing holistic care for children affected by HIV/AIDS, poverty, and neglect. The ministry focuses on education, healthcare, clean water access, and spiritual development. Amazima Ministries also supports local families and communities, ensuring sustainable growth and empowerment. Katie's hands-on approach and deep connection with the children have been crucial to the ministry's success and reputation.
