Background of the Novel

William Golding's Life and Influences

William Golding, born in 1911 in Cornwall, England, had a varied background that influenced his writing. He served in the Royal Navy during World War II, an experience that deeply affected his view of humanity and society. The brutality of war and the darkness he witnessed became central themes in his work. Golding's education at Oxford University, where he studied English literature, further shaped his literary pursuits.

In the early 1950s, Golding began writing "Lord of the Flies." The novel was inspired by his observations of children and his belief that, when removed from societal structures, humans tend to revert to primal instincts.
