Background of Loving v. Virginia

In the 1960s, racial segregation and discrimination were pervasive in many aspects of American life, including marriage laws. Virginia had laws in place that prohibited interracial marriage, particularly between white individuals and people of other races. The case of Loving v. Virginia originated when Richard Loving, a white man, and Mildred Jeter, a Black woman, married in Washington, D.C. in 1958. Upon returning to Virginia, they were arrested for violating the state's anti-miscegenation laws.

The Lovings were convicted and sentenced to a year in prison, which could be suspended if they left Virginia for 25 years. This sentence prompted the couple to appeal their case, leading to a significant legal battle.

The Legal Journey

The Lovings took their case to the Virginia Supreme Court, which upheld their conviction, stating that the state's laws did not violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Unwilling to accept this ruling, the couple sought assistance from the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), which eventually brought the case before the United States Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court Ruling

On June 12, 1967, the Supreme Court delivered a unanimous decision in favor of the Lovings. The ruling declared that state bans on interracial marriage were unconstitutional, effectively invalidating laws in Virginia and other states that enforced such prohibitions. The Court's decision was based on two primary arguments:

1. Violation of the Equal Protection Clause: The Court argued that the laws discriminated on the basis of race, thus violating the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.
2. Violation of the Due Process Clause: The ruling also stated that the right to marry is a fundamental liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

This decision not only struck down laws against interracial marriage but also set a precedent for future civil rights cases.
