Understanding Nordic Runes: Origins and Evolution

Nordic runes constitute an ancient script used primarily by Germanic tribes in Scandinavia and surrounding regions. Originating around the 2nd to 3rd centuries AD, runes were inscribed on stones, wood, metal, and other materials for various purposes including communication, ritual, and commemoration. The runic alphabet, known as the Futhark—named after its first six letters—underwent several adaptations over centuries, reflecting linguistic changes and regional influences.

The Elder Futhark

The Elder Futhark is the oldest form of the runic alphabet, consisting of 24 characters. It was widely used from approximately 150 to 800 AD. These runes were often carved on weapons, jewelry, and memorial stones. Each rune symbolized not only a phoneme but also carried symbolic meaning related to Norse mythology and cosmology.

The Younger Futhark and Anglo-Saxon Runes

By the Viking Age, the Elder Futhark evolved into the Younger Futhark, which contained only 16 characters. This reduction in number corresponded to linguistic shifts in Old Norse. Simultaneously, Anglo-Saxon runes developed in England, incorporating additional characters to suit the Old English language. The Younger Futhark was predominantly used until the Middle Ages when Latin script gradually replaced runes in Scandinavia.

- Origins date back to 2nd-3rd century AD
- Initial 24-character Elder Futhark alphabet
- Transition to 16-character Younger Futhark during Viking Age
- Anglo-Saxon runes as a parallel development
- Runes served phonetic and symbolic functions
