Clarifying Individual and Shared Goals

Each partner should communicate their personal goals for the break as well as any shared objectives. This might include focusing on mental health, evaluating feelings, or addressing external stressors. Frequency and Mode of Contact

Couples should decide how often and by what means they will communicate during the break. Some may agree to minimal contact, while others prefer periodic check-ins. Agreeing on communication frequency helps avoid feelings of neglect or overwhelm.

Reevaluating the Relationship Post-Break

After the agreed-upon break period, partners must come together to assess their feelings and decide the relationship's future. This stage is integral to the success of the break and requires honest reflection.

Conducting an Open and Honest Discussion

Both individuals should share their experiences and insights gained during the break. Transparency about emotions and expectations is necessary to determine whether to reconcile, continue the relationship with new boundaries, or part ways amicably.
