Understanding Love Addiction

Love addiction is often misunderstood as simply being in love or having a strong attachment to someone. However, it is a more profound and often destructive condition.

Definition and Symptoms

Love addiction can be defined as an obsessive need for emotional and physical intimacy that leads to compulsive behaviors in relationships. Symptoms may include:

- Preoccupation with relationships: Constantly thinking about a partner or potential partner.
- Fear of abandonment: An intense anxiety about being left alone or rejected.
- Compulsive behaviors: Engaging in behaviors such as stalking, excessive texting, or trying to manipulate situations to keep a partner close.
- Loss of identity: Feeling incomplete or worthless without a partner.
- Repeated unhealthy relationships: Falling into the same patterns of toxic relationships despite knowing the consequences.

Pia Mellody emphasizes that love addiction often stems from underlying issues, including:

1. Childhood trauma: Experiences of neglect, abuse, or abandonment during childhood can lead to an unhealthy attachment style.
2. Low self-esteem: Individuals may seek validation and self-worth through romantic relationships.
