

piggy palace good time society

Piggy Palace Good Time Society is a name that evokes a mix of intrigue and horror, primarily due to its association with one of the most notorious criminal cases in Canadian history. This organization was a front for the nefarious activities of its founder, Robert "Willie" Pickton, who was later convicted of multiple murders in the early 2000s. The story of the Piggy Palace Good Time Society and its dark legacy serves as a stark reminder of how seemingly innocent organizations can mask the most heinous of actions.

Background of the Organization

The Piggy Palace Good Time Society was established in the 1990s by Robert Pickton, a pig farmer in Port Coquitlam, British Columbia. The organization was ostensibly created as a social club that hosted parties and events, often featuring barbecue gatherings and music. However, behind this facade lay a much darker reality.

Establishment and Activities

1. Founding:

- Robert Pickton, along with his brother, founded the Piggy Palace Good Time Society when he was looking for ways to socialize and attract people to his farm.
- The society was registered as a non-profit organization in 1996.

2. Events:

- The society organized various events, including pig roasts and parties that attracted many individuals.
- These gatherings often included vulnerable populations, such as sex workers from Vancouver's Downtown Eastside, who were drawn to the free food, drinks, and the promise of a good time.

3. Community Engagement:

- Pickton portrayed himself as a community-minded individual, eager to help those who were less fortunate.
- The events often featured the use of his farm facilities, which made it appear as a welcoming and friendly environment.

The Dark Side of Piggy Palace Good Time Society

While the public perception of the Piggy Palace Good Time Society was that of a harmless social club, the truth was far more disturbing. The organization became a significant part of Robert Pickton's criminal activities, which included the abduction and murder of numerous women.

Connection to Disappearances

1. Victims:

- Many of the women who went missing from Vancouver's Downtown Eastside were last seen in the vicinity of Pickton's farm or attending events hosted by the society.
- It is estimated that Pickton was responsible for the deaths of at least 49 women, though he was charged with 27 counts of murder.

2. Victim Profile:

- The majority of Pickton's victims were marginalized women, including sex workers and individuals struggling with addiction.
- This made them more vulnerable and less likely to be reported missing or taken seriously by law enforcement.

Law Enforcement and Investigations

1. Initial Investigations:

- Despite the growing number of missing women, law enforcement initially failed to connect the disappearances to Pickton or his organization.
- There were multiple reports and tips that pointed to Pickton, but they were often dismissed or inadequately pursued.

2. Breakthroughs:

- In 2002, police executed a search warrant on Pickton's farm, leading to the discovery of human remains and personal belongings belonging to several missing women.
- This search was a turning point in the investigation, eventually leading to Pickton's arrest in 2002.

3. Trial and Conviction:

- Pickton's trial began in 2007, and he was ultimately convicted of six counts of second-degree murder in 2007, with the jury unable to reach a verdict on 20 other counts.
- He was sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole for 25 years.
