History of Pittock Mansion

Origins and Construction

The Pittock Mansion was constructed in 1914 as the private residence of Henry Pittock and his wife, Georgiana. Henry Pittock was a prominent businessman and publisher who played a pivotal role in the development of Portland and the Pacific Northwest. The mansion was built to reflect the wealth and status of the Pittock family, using high-quality materials and state-of-the-art amenities for the time. Construction took approximately two years, involving skilled craftsmen and artisans who contributed to the home's meticulous design and finish.

The Pittock Family Legacy

Henry and Georgiana Pittock lived in the mansion until their deaths, after which the house remained in the family for several decades. The mansion not only served as a family home but also as a symbol of Portland's growth and prosperity during the early 20th century. Over time, the property transitioned from private residence to historic landmark, preserving the legacy of the Pittock family and their contributions to the city's cultural and economic development.

Architectural Features

Design and Style
