History of Johnson Brothers

Founding and Early Years

Johnson Brothers was established in 1883 in the city of Burslem, Staffordshire, England, by four brothers: Alfred, Fred, Henry, and Robert Johnson. They initially focused on producing earthenware, but their passion for quality craftsmanship soon led them to venture into fine china production. The company gained recognition for its innovative designs and durable products, quickly becoming a household name.

Expansion and Innovations

Throughout the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Johnson Brothers expanded its production capabilities and product lines. They introduced various techniques, such as transfer printing, which allowed for more intricate designs at a lower cost. This innovation helped the company cater to a growing market eager for decorative tableware.

By the mid-20th century, Johnson Brothers had established a reputation for producing high-quality china that appealed to consumers across the globe. The introduction of iconic patterns solidified the brand's status, making it a staple in many households.

Acquisition and Legacy

In 1968, Johnson Brothers was acquired by the American company, Wedgwood. Although the brand has changed hands several times over the years, it has maintained its legacy, with products still being produced under the Johnson Brothers name. The company's history and commitment to quality craftsmanship continue to resonate with collectors and enthusiasts alike.
