The historical context surrounding Richard Greener and the white problem is crucial to understanding the racial dynamics of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Richard Greener was born in 1844 into a society deeply divided by race, where African Americans faced systemic discrimination following the abolition of slavery. The Reconstruction era initially promised progress and integration, but the rise of Jim Crow laws and widespread segregation created formidable barriers. In this environment, the white problem referred to the pervasive attitudes and structural inequalities imposed by white society that hindered African American advancement.
