The Historical Background of Sadako Sasaki

Sadako Sasaki was a young girl who lived in Hiroshima, Japan, during the time of World War II. Born in 1943, Sadako was only two years old when the atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima on August 6, 1945. Although she initially survived the blast, years later she developed leukemia, a result of radiation exposure from the bombing. This illness was commonly known as the "atomic bomb disease" due to its prevalence among survivors. Sadako's story began when she was hospitalized and learned about the Japanese legend that promises anyone who folds one thousand paper cranes will be granted a wish. Motivated by hope and determination, Sadako began folding paper cranes as a symbol of her wish for health and peace.

Context of the Hiroshima Bombing

The atomic bombing of Hiroshima was a pivotal event in world history, marking the first use of nuclear weapons in warfare. The bomb devastated the city, instantly killing tens of thousands of people and causing long-term health effects from radiation exposure. Survivors, known as hibakusha, faced immense physical and emotional challenges. Sadako's experience as a hibakusha highlights the personal tragedies amid this historical catastrophe and brings a human face to the abstract horror of nuclear warfare.
